

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

SIR JOHN FRANKLIN, in the New Plutarch Series (G. P. Putnam's Sons), is a spirited sketch of the adventures of the great Arctic explorer, by Mr. A. H. Beesly. Sir John's own narratives of his first and second expeditions are of course the basis of the greater part of this work, in which the salient features of the story of hardship and daring are presented with picture-like terseness. The account of the fatal third expedition and of the several search expeditions, is comparatively brief. The work that Parry and Franklin carried well forward in the early years of the century is perhaps more than over the object of individual ambition and national enterprise. Until the mystery of the Arctic circle is uncovered, as it doubtless will be some day, the story of the adventures and tragic fate of Sir John Franklin will have a living interest, and those readers who have not the time for the full details will be well satisfied with Mr. Beesly's narrative.

"Habitual Mouth-Breathing" is the title of a paper read by Dr. Clinton Wagner before the New York Medical Society, and now published by G. P. Putnam's Sons. If he is right in tracing many diseases of the throat and ear to mouth-breathing as a frequent cause, it is surprising that medical men have so long neglected the subject. Nature intended that the lungs should be filled through the nostrils, which are lined with blood vessels that warm the air inhaled. Where mouth-breathing is due to physical defects, if remedies are sought in youth the evil may be averted. It is a habit that eventually distorts the features, and in Dr. Wagner's opinion, is the cause of all the sojourning. George Catlin, the student of Indian life and customs, was one of the first to call attention to the evils of habitual mouth-breathing. He had observed Indian mothers closing the mouths of their infants as they fell asleep.
